

Why ADR Group Training

Choosing to become a mediator is an important decision - choosing the right mediator training organisations is just as important.

A quick internet search will show various providers claiming differing amounts of experience and expertise, so which course will give your mediation practice the best possible start? The answer is that with new providers springing up all of the time, without doing your research, it is very difficult to know.

Whatever training you choose, make sure you know it will meet all of the relevant standards and that your qualification will be fully recognised by the lead bodies in the specialist area you want to practice in. It is also useful to know what opportunities for mediation referrals and professional membership are available to you post training.

What we at ADR Group and our trainees know is that ADR Group have consistently delivered the highest levels of mediator training, developed and honed over 20 years, and have remained at the forefront of mediation training and provision throughout that time. This experience and pedigree has enabled ADR Group to develop specialist divisions dedicated to the needs of Civil/Commercial, Family Hybrid and Workplace. We have also delivered mediator training programmes to professionals in over 15 countries worldwide.

Finally, for those of you who are considering training as a Mediator, remember that training is just the beginning. Developing your mediation practice will take time and hard work, involving not just the development of a professional career or career change but often also the development of a new business. Not only does ADR Group provide the very best in fully recognised foundation training leading to membership of professional mediation bodies but ADR Group can also help with developing your practice, through Panel Memberships providing the opportunity to observe and/or receive mediation referrals.
